

Edward C. Leather

Bendigo Advertiser

23 July, 1869

WHROO. (FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.) Tuesday, 20th July.

A sad accident happened close to the township, at the Nine Mile rush, on Saturday night or Sunday morning, by which a miner named Edward C. Leather (from London) instantaneously met his death.

Mr Leather was about thirty-five years of age. After leaving the township on Saturday night to return to his hut, he left his mate and lay down near a large tree which was then on fire. During the night the tree fell across his face and crushed his skull.

When found by a woman about eight o'clock on Sunday morning his left arm from the wrist to above the elbow was completely burnt away. The police removed him to his hut, and a magisterial enquiry took place yesterday, resulting in a verdict of accidental death.

He was buried last night in the Whroo cemetery.

Bendigo Advertiser

23 August, 1869

Accidents to persons unknown are of frequent occurrence, and it is well to publish them that surviving friends may be apprised of them.

On the 18th of July a man named Edward C. Leather, aged about thirty-five, was killed at the Nine Mile by the falling of a tree. He was respectably connected, as was shown by correspondence and documents found on his person.

One letter was from a niece, signed J. M. Austine, 91 London Wall; another letter which may lead to more immediate identification was from J. Wheeler, Eaglehawk.

Deceased had a mate, but he knows little or nothing of him or his friends.

Other reports were published in the Waranga Echo of 22 July 1869, which indicate that Mr Leather and his mate were “the worse for drink” on their journey.